Regional Professional Development Center present . . .

Collaborative Teams
with
Rick and Rebecca DuFour

There is a growing consensus among educational researchers that school personnel must develop their capacity to function as a professional learning community (PLC) if schools are to become significantly more effective in meeting the increasing demands placed upon them. What are the characteristics of a PLC? How do these schools operate? How could we recognize when a school is functioning as a PLC? Join the day with Rick and Rebecca DuFour as they share their thoughts and strategies for implementing collaborative teams in professional learning communities.

Clarity of Purpose

- What is it we want students to learn? What should each student know and be able to do?
- How will we respond when a student has achieved this learning?
- How will we respond when a student is not learning? What systematic process is in place to provide support for students who are struggling?

Collaborative School Culture

- No school can help all students achieve at high levels if teachers work in isolation.
- Schools improve when teachers are given the time and support to work together to clarify essential student learning and assessment.
- Schools must identify and implement new practices for raising student achievement.

Focus on Results

- PLCs measure their effectiveness on the basis of results rather than intentions.
- All programs, policies, and practices are assessed on the basis of their impact on student learning.
- All staff receives relevant information on their effectiveness in achieving intended results.

Rick DuFour is the past superintendent of the Adlai E. Stevenson High School District in suburban Chicago, a district that went from low achievement to exemplary under DuFour's leadership. He has co-authored numerous books on Professional Learning Communities. Becky DuFour, co-presenter, had equally good results as principal of a low-income, rural elementary school in Franklin County, Va.
